Interview Responses

First Interview (Father/Ski Patrol)

Ethan: How did you first become a ski patroller, and what did you have to complete before working independently?

Father: I started volunteering with the local patrol and then completed Outdoor Emergency Care certification. After that, there was on-hill training—sled handling, lift evacuation practice, radio protocol. You're not cleared to respond alone until senior patrollers sign off on you.

Ethan: When you were new, what was hardest to learn?

Father: Radio communication. It's very structured. You have to be concise, clear, and calm. Also, writing accident reports properly takes practice because they're legal documents.

Ethan: What kinds of writing do you do during a shift?

Father: Mostly incident reports. If there's an injury, everything gets documented—time, location, witness statements, what we observed, what treatment was given.

Ethan: What happens communication-wise during an incident?

Father: Dispatch calls it in over the radio. We respond, confirm arrival, assess the patient, communicate findings, request transport if needed, and then complete written documentation afterward.

Ethan: How did you learn to write reports correctly?

Father: By reading examples and getting corrections. Senior patrollers review reports and tell you if something is unclear or too opinion-based. Reports have to be factual.

Ethan: What makes someone experienced in patrol?

Father: Calm communication under pressure. Clear radio calls. Detailed but objective reports. Experts don't overtalk—they communicate exactly what's needed.

Ethan: What mistakes do new patrollers make?

Father: Talking too much on the radio or adding opinions in reports instead of sticking to observable facts.

Ethan: What advice would you give a new patroller?

Father: Listen more than you speak. Learn the language. And always assume what you write could be reviewed later.

Second Interview (Sister/Ski Instructor)

Ethan: How did you first join ski school?

Sister: I applied, did training weekend, shadowed lessons, and then had a supervisor observe me before I was cleared to teach solo.

Ethan: What felt confusing when you started?

Sister: The lesson structure and terminology. Also, the daily schedule system and how groups are assigned.

Ethan: What kinds of communication or writing do you use during a shift?

Sister: We check the schedule board, use radios sometimes, and write short lesson notes about what the student worked on and recommendations for next time.

Ethan: Can you walk me through a typical day?

Sister: Check in, review assignments, meet guests, teach, debrief the lesson, and complete lesson notes. Sometimes we communicate with supervisors if there's a behavior or safety concern.

Ethan: How did you learn to write lesson notes?

Sister: Mostly by seeing examples from other instructors and getting feedback from supervisors. They emphasize being clear and professional.

Ethan: Are there unwritten rules?

Sister: Yes—don't criticize the guest, focus on progress, use positive language. And keep notes concise.

Ethan: What makes someone an expert instructor?

Sister: Clear communication with guests and coworkers. Also, knowing how to adapt lesson plans quickly.

Ethan: What mistakes do new instructors make?

Sister: Overcomplicating explanations and writing vague notes like "worked on turns" instead of specific skills.

Ethan: What advice would you give someone new?

Sister: Watch experienced instructors, copy their structure, and always communicate clearly with both guests and supervisors.
